As defined under Arizona law, estate planning is planning the management and the disposition of your assets while you are alive and after your death. It also includes planning for your healthcare in case you become incapable of taking care of yourself. With the help of an Arizona estate planning lawyer, you can rest assured that your life's work will be well taken care of.

In Arizona, if you die without a will, you may not have proper representation, and your family might be left fighting over your assets. If this is the case, Arizona will decide the successor to your property. It is best to hire a lawyer to get your affairs in order before it is too late. A good lawyer can interpret the maze of laws on property rights, taxes, probate and trusts.

Arizona estate planning lawyers can help you decide how to transfer property and resolve other financial and personal matters including retirement funding and tax planning. Most importantly, they can guide you through the process of making a will. They can help you set up a trust naming who will hold your property until your death and disperse the property according to your will.

Before hiring an estate-planning lawyer, you should verify his/her expertise and credentials because estate planning is a very important process in your life. To find an estate-planning lawyer, you can check with the State Bar Association of Arizona, or you can search on the Internet.
