

Chicago Personal Injury Claims

---

Article by: Jason Gluckman

On average, most personal injury claims are a result of auto collisions, and these claims usually fall under the heading of tort law. The person filing the lawsuit ought to establish that two main incidents have occurred. These two incidents are a "fault" and "damages." Although a few states do have "no fault" accident laws, as a general rule, injured parties can always approach the courts for damages they have incurred.

In an automobile injury case, it should be established that the defendant failed to apply reasonable care while driving, and that it is this negligence that caused the actual damages to the injured party. It is very important that this is proven, since the jury will often decide whether to award a settlement based on this information.

You can report occurrence of negligence in other cases as well. Although automobile accidents are most often reported, cases of medical malpractice are being reported and argued in court.

There are also claims that arise due to personal injuries caused by defective products. In these cases, the injured party is not required to prove the negligence of the manufacturer or designer. In its place, the claimant must merely provide evidence that, in spite of the product being used as directed, the design of the product made that item unduly hazardous. If the claimant endured damages as a consequence, the courts will give a ruling in favor of a monetary award to cover medical expenses, pain and suffering, and lost wages.

When considering lodging personal injury claims, it is important to speak with an experienced lawyer. Bear in mind the specific statute of limitations set by your state, and think about the fact that you need to get legal representation soon. Consider using the Internet to gather all the information you need about a lawyer. Chicago Personal Injury Lawyers provides detailed information about Chicago personal injury lawyers, Chicago personal injury funding, Chicago personal injury law firms, and more. Chicago Personal Injury Lawyers is affiliated with Traumatic Brain Injury Lawyer.