

Chicago Personal Injury Funding

Article by: Jason Gluckman

Personal injury funding is accessible to individuals who have rightful claims of injury but who are not financially capable of taking up litigation. This situation often arises with claims relating to toxic substances, medical malpractice, and drug reactions. These claims require long-lasting scrutiny and expert witnesses, both resulting in high expenses to the plaintiff. Though some lawyers will take these cases on a contingency basis, the expenses may surpass the capability of the lawyer or the personal injury firm to sustain.

If you require personal injury funding, you may be entitled to a cash advance. This money does not have to be repaid like a traditional loan, you only pay if you win your claim. The money that you received via your settlement would be then utilized to repay the funding. Because of these uncertainty and length of time involved the legal funding companies are very cautious while examining who they fund.

Most often, you would find that the defendant is a big corporation with huge financial resources to use against a plaintiff of moderate means. The way a case is pursued depends on the available resources. There is a big difference between presenting a case with the basics covered and presenting an all-out case with high-powered experts, graphics, and video. If you wish to pursue the latter option, you will likely have to obtain legal funding from outside groups.

Also, remember that even though you have insurance coverage, it does not always pay enough to the injured party. Insurance companies pay the injured party on the basis of the determination made by their statisticians and claims adjusters. Sometimes these payments do not cover your injuries and you may need to take legal action. If the person filing the complaint has a valid case, he has a good chance of getting legal funding.
