

Los Angeles Lawyer

Article by: Damian Sofsian

A typical lawyer is one who knows the real meaning of law and justice. The practice of law is exciting, rewarding and meaningful, but one has to realize his ability to beneficially and significantly affect the lives of many people. The practice of law is a broadening and educational experience.

Similar to any other field, like medicine, science or education, law requires a certain attitude towards life and work, and is good for someone who enjoys learning. Some lawyers are general lawyers who can handle multiple cases, while others practice in a specialized field. These can be in areas like personal injury, criminal cases, business and corporate law, labor and employment law, real property, litigation, individual rights, family law and others.

Where a personal injury lawyer seeks monetary compensation for damages incurred due to hospital or medical care, loss of work earnings (including future potential), and pain or suffering, a private-practice lawyer works in law firms or is self-employed. Transactional lawyers work to avoid legal problems, for example, by writing contracts. Litigators, or trial lawyers, deal with problems such as broken contracts and others.

Some lawyers join corporate houses while others prefer to work with government. Then there are a few who are self-employed and are called solo practitioners. Though most of them begin their careers working in law firms, the contacts and experience they gain help them develop their own firm.

Los Angeles lawyers work with issues affecting people's lives. Their main job is to solve a client's problem and be sensitive towards it. They have objective and analytical skills to identify the potential legal issues that should be addressed, and then formulate a plan to reach a result suitable to the desires of the client as well as the requirements of the law.

They are important, as they work for improvements in the administration of justice, like working with judges on court improvement projects and with the Legislature on improving laws.
