Mesothelioma is a tumor of the mesothelium, which is a layer of cells forming a thin membrane that lines certain body cavities. A tumor in these area can be benign (localized) or malignant (diffusely spread). Mesothelioma is most commonly caused by the ingestion of asbestos particles. The disease varies, depending on the body part affected. Mesothelioma is characterized by symptoms including difficulty in breathing, a persistent and chronic cough, or even a change in normal coughing pattern.

The disease is very aggressive and the affected don't get too much time to show symptoms and therefore no question of diagnosis arises. Even if it shows, symptoms start appearing only after a period of years. It usually occurs to people who have high-risk occupations such as brake mechanics, maintenance work, or any other occupation where exposure to asbestos is likely.

Once mesothelioma is diagnosed, recovery chances usually vary according to several factors. They include size and location of the tumor, how much it has spread, and the age of the patient. Since it is a form of cancer, it is usually treated by chemotherapy. New and modern techniques have been devised and detection systems are also being installed in workplaces to help protect people from asbestos exposure. Constant monitoring system will be very helpful, because the workers will be able to check the asbestos content in their bodies. If the workers are not notified of the dangers that might arise because of their jobs, then they become vulnerable to mesothelioma. In that case, lawsuits can be filed against industries causing this infection due to their exhausts and effluents, as well as lack of cautions taken to protect the workers. These workers can sue the industry for any amount depending on the intensity of the tumor and recovery possibilities.

Lawsuits can be filed with the help of attorneys who specialize in handling the cases of clients affected by the disease. They will give you expert opinions based on the diagnosis and the client's knowledge of asbestos exposure in the workplace or where he was affected.
