

RV Lemon Laws

Article by: Damian Sofsian

If you own a recreational vehicle (RV), you know how enjoyable it is to drive around with the comforts of home wherever you go. Whether you lease or purchase the vehicle, you know how difficult it is to save up enough money to be able to afford an RV. So if you are having trouble with your vehicle, you are covered under the lemon law that entitles you to demand compensation directly from the RV's manufacturer and not from the dealer, entitles you to demand a replacement vehicle, or entitles you to a full-refund of your money.

Oftentimes, the dealer or the manufacturer will try to persuade you that the problem is negligible and that you shouldn't be concerned. This is often not the case, as small problems can always lead to larger nuisances for you in the future. Whether it is a small defect or a large defect, federal laws ensure that the manufacturer needs to deliver the intended services or product as promised or advertised. If these are not delivered, you, as a consumer, have every right to demand that they be met. Even if your vehicle is not covered by the lemon law, you will still be able to file for a case on a breach of warranty agreement.

It is also wise for you to employ a lawyer to help you when you file the case. A legal professional can help you get all the requirements in order before going into court. A good lawyer would even be able to help you retrieve some sort of compensation even beyond what is expected and even when your vehicle is out of warranty or is not covered by the lemon law.
